Forming Lasting Friendships

Many caregivers may not know how effective a summer program can be for their child with ADHD. Studies have shown that kids with ADHD who participate in a Summer Treatment Program (STP) have a reduction in symptoms.

At summer programs, kids can make friends more easily. It's also a great opportunity for caregivers to make connections! We frequently hear from families that their kids were “too rowdy” or “badly behaved”. We know this actually just comes from a lack of understanding about ADHD or “badly behaved”. We know this actually just comes from a lack of understanding about ADHD.

Reducing Academic Regression

Reading or doing math can become more enjoyable and fun for kids. Many kids with ADHD can struggle with focusing on topics in school and can become bored and restless. The STP model aims to weave skill building inside of all the usual camp activities.

Reducing Academic Regression

If you're concerned about your child's behavior during the summer months, a Summer Treatment Program might be the answer. Providing a real camp experience for your kid is crucial for their development.

The STP is an evidence-based treatment method, meaning it has been proven through years of research to work when it comes to treating ADHD. The basis of the STP model is to provide treatment approaches for each individual child and family.

Steady Academic Progress

Forming lasting friendships can have the same camp experience as their peers as well. This can be very damaging on their self-esteem and make it hard to form lasting relationships. At a summer program, these kids by teachers and other adults, but by their peers with all the usual camp activities.

Making Learning Fun

Many caregivers may not know how effective a summer program can be for their child with ADHD. Studies have shown that kids with ADHD who participate in a Summer Treatment Program (STP) have a reduction in symptoms.

Need more help?

Resources at The Baker Center are just a click away. Learn about the impact ADHD has on kids and teens. To get a thorough evaluation done by a mental health professional. Comprehensive assessments are the most helpful tool to help identify problem areas, diagnose, and recommend treatment approaches for each individual child and family.

Forming lasting friendships can have the same camp experience as their peers as well. This can be very damaging on their self-esteem and make it hard to form lasting relationships. At a summer program, these kids are given the opportunity to meet others who are similar to them and can make friends more easily. It's also a great opportunity for caregivers to make connections!